The faster it changes, the higher the induced current and the higher the voltage that could be generated in an attempt to push it. So yes... The output voltage is proportional to the rotation speed. That said, however, it has to work well enough at starter cranking RPM or the engine would never even start.

I designed it that way (high CG) so it would match up with the existing store bought engine holder. On wider, I have limited space so I really wanted the stand to take up no more space than again the existing holder. Your points are well taken though, the plan will be to see about adding some outriggers that are removable to widen the base.

I made mine out of scrap steel. It has a series of holes to adjust from big to small block, it's high enough that I can drop a pan while it's on there, run any basic header, and the gage pod, ignition module, and starter button are on a removable panel so I can leave the stand outside when it's not in use.
